

The SKIES DURING MAY

By PROF. W. A. GATHRIGHT.

GENERALLY speaking, comets appear to be bodies whose texture is very unsubstantial. The smaller ones appear merely as round, oval-shaped masses of vapor, or hazy light that is either uniformly bright or with a brighter spot near the center. The larger and brighter comets, in which there appears a nucleus or head, are found when viewed through a telescope to be of a substance that is far less substantial than that of a star. Those that leave a long fiery train behind them sometimes show a minute stellar point of light at the center. It is from this inner kernel that there seems to emanate a fiery stream of luminous matter that gradually broadens and becomes so diffused as to form one long train that grows less and less distinct until it has entirely faded from view. Comets, as they are distributed through space, are found to be very numerous. Many hundreds of them have been observed and astronomically recorded. Usually as many as six telescopic comets are discovered with the period of a year. Many of these rapidly flying visitants to our system are also supposed to traverse only that horizon of the heavens that is above the horizon in the daytime. Hence, the rather remarkable statement of Kepler would seem justifiable when he says: "Celestial space is as full of comets as the sea is of fishes." As a rule, but one or two naked-eye comets are seen in a lifetime. There is upon the astronomical records of the ancients the account of some most remarkable comets. That which appeared at the birth of Minerva is said to have had a disk equal in magnitude to that of the sun. Justin refers to one that lasted ten days; that it occupied a fourth part of the sky, required four hours to rise and four hours to set, and that its light was superior to that of the sun. Frezel also refers to one that appeared in the year 419 A. D., that was of such magnitude as to cause the remarkable eclipse of the sun that occurred about that time. Those that appeared in 1066 and 1565 are said to have exhibited disks that were larger than those of the moon. Other instances are mentioned in history of comets that appeared so bright as to be plainly seen in the daytime. Those of as recent periods as 1843 and 1858 were distinctly seen amid the open glare of the sun.

Famous Blaze Stars.

The so-called new stars differ materially from what are termed by astronomers as variable stars, in that they blaze out unexpectedly at points where they have never been seen before, and within a few days or months fade entirely from view. Among the most famous of these is one that appeared in the outburst of Andromeda, of which the nebulae was first noticed on the night of Aug. 19, 1855. It continued to grow in brightness until the following September, when it withdrew with an unsteady, wavering light. On Aug. 6, 1572, a star of the first magnitude suddenly appeared in Cassiopeia at a point where no star had been seen up to within half a century before. It continued to increase in brightness until it exceeded any other star in the heavens, and could be seen at midday.

The new star that is said to have appeared in the year 1254 and the one seen at harvest time in England in 925, together with the unusual manifestations that appeared in the days of Pope Honorius I. and at the time of Constantine's conversion to Christianity have led astronomers to establish a cycle of about 314 years, which seems to identify all subsequent periods of starbursts with that of the famous comet of Bethlehem. This series of starbursts with the years A. D. 4, 214, 622, 936, 1254, 1572 and 1885.

Stars and Constellations Now Visible.

Ursa Major with the pointers of the Great Dipper are now near the zenith at 9 p.m., while just opposite under the pole, and almost touching the tops of the northern hills, shines Cassiopeia's throne. To the westward are Perseus and Auriga sinking below the horizon, while to the eastward are Hercules and Lyra rising. In the latter constellation appears the famous ring nebula, which lies about midway between the stars Beta and Gamma. It can readily be seen with a small telescope. As it is one of the ring nebulae that have as yet been discovered, it has been given much attention, and proves to be an object of special study by astronomers. Sir John Herschel, who has perhaps given it more of his time than anyone else, says: "The central vacuity is not quite dark, but appears to be filled in with a faint nebula, like a gauze stretched over a hoop." A marked difference between this nebula and the one lying just across the border of Lyra in Vulpecula is seen in this, that the latter assumes the well-defined shape of a dumbbell surrounded on all sides by an ill-defined nebulous atmosphere. While observing the nebula in the region it will be noticed that the Milky Way at this hour occupies a most peculiar position. Instead of crossing the upper dome of the heavens, as it did during February and March, it simply stretches along near the northern horizon in the form of a semi-circle from Monoceros on the west round to Scorpion in the southeast. The moonless evenings of this month will doubtless afford excellent opportunity for many to note the position of the Galaxy and the constellations that lie about it. The principal stars that appear, as it were, behind its lace-like curtains, are Beta and Zeta in Taurus; Omega, Delta and Epsilon in Cassiopeia; Omega and Gamma in Cygnus; Altair in Aquila; Eta in Ophiuchus; while Antares brings up the rear in Scorpion. This long line of twinklers, combined with that presented by the Galaxy itself, to anyone having the knowledge and imagination to appreciate it, there is here presented a scene that is especially interesting and attractive. At this hour in the evening it will be noticed that the zodiacal archway stands with Virgo near the meridian, while Libra, followed by Scorpio, are rising. Leo, Cancer and Gemini, each in their order, descend down the celestial slopes toward the eastern horizon. Low in the southeast are Comus and Centaurus, with the eastern end of Hydra lying between. In the southwest are Argo and Monoceros. In the upper part of the former and completely immersed in the Milky Way, is a conspicuous group of third and fourth magnitude stars, while close to the eastern edge of Auriga Major and in close proximity with this group is the star Eta. It lies about twelve degrees north of Sirius, and marks the southeast corner of the constellation in which it is situated. Directly north of Virgo are Coma Berenices and Canes Venatici, with Bootes lying adjacent on the east.

DISCOVERY of CHLOROFORM

In Spite of Discouragements, Dr. Guthrie Made Combination.

(Chicago Journal.)

The twenty-third of May which is to serve as a memorial to Dr. Samuel Guthrie, discoverer of chloroform, is the object of great interest as it rests temporarily at Michigan avenue and Jackson boulevard. The boulder will be placed in its permanent position in Grant park as soon as arrangements can be made for a site. There is some difference of opinion between the city and the monument board, but it is probable the monument will go to a spot near the art institute. Osgood Guthrie, a grandson of Samuel Guthrie, has the matter in charge.

"Chloroform was discovered by Dr. Guthrie in 1831, but it was not until Oct. 16, 1846, that its success as a general anesthetic was established. Dr. John C. Warren proved its value in the Massachusetts general hospital. The experiment was made by Dr. Warren and Dr. William F. G. Morton, the latter a Boston dentist. Dr. Morton extracted all the teeth from the lower jaw of a patient without causing the slightest pain. "Gentlemen," said Dr. Warren, addressing those present, "this is a triumph."

It was a notable experiment in which every one who took part achieved glory except the man who had been told that his name is not even mentioned in a footnote to an account of the occurrence.

There is no doubt, however, of the discovery of chloroform by Dr. Guthrie, then in the employ of the city of New York, came as the result of reading an article in Stillman's Journal, wherein it was stated that a new imported drug, known as "Dutch liquid," was a very grateful diaphoretic stimulant with a little alcohol, sugar, and water.

As there had never been the slightest doubt in the mind of Dr. Guthrie that the "Dutch liquid" was a "grateful, diaphoretic stimulant," he began to experiment in ways to make it cheaper and more effective. "Grateful" to the multitude of the poor, he began to experiment in making his experiments in not only the use of chloroform, but also in the use of the principal ingredients, because there was never any scarcity of that chemical around Sackett's Harbor, and it was naturally the very first thing that every one thought of in case of an emergency. This was a condition not peculiar to Sackett's Harbor, but it was the same respect for the chemical being general throughout the northeastern New York.

With the whisky, which he had been using as a disinfectant around the house, Guthrie's part was self-evident on Dr. Guthrie's part. He was not a chemist, but he could bring himself to the point of combining the two, and that, in fact, he was doing so. But resistance and courage won.

"I would never risk it, Sam," said Fernando Jones, who stood near him, watching developments. "You'll die this day."

It was in the spring of 1846. Mr. Jones was comparatively a young man in those days, and had accompanied Dr. Guthrie home from the tavern, fearing that something might happen to Sam as he passed down the thronged streets of Sackett's Harbor with all that whisky in his jug.

But in spite of Fernando Jones and his own scruples and misgivings, Dr. Guthrie added to the whisky. Then the stuff was boiled and the result was chloroform.

But it was not called so by Dr. Guthrie, who named it chloric ether. And even after it was put upon the market as a "grateful and diaphoretic stimulant," Fernando Jones insisted that he didn't think much of the stuff, and that, in fact, the only Dutch liquid he ever really cared for was Holland.

Sixteen years passed, however, before chloroform or ether came to be used as a general anesthetic by inhalation. But the original discovery of its manufacture has never been disputed. It was used in surgery through the experiments of the Scotch surgeon, Sir James Y. Simpson, of Edinburgh, who first published a pamphlet concerning its miraculous effects.

Today that pamphlet is a thing of the past, a spirit of anger rather than rejoicing in the fact that the world has been made a little less painful, and that the world is a little less painful.

Just now Dr. Guthrie came to select the proper chemicals in making his experiments. It is not clearly known, but it is supposed that he first selected whisky as the principal ingredient, because there was never any scarcity of that chemical around Sackett's Harbor, and it was naturally the very first thing that every one

AN UNPREMEDITATED LULLABY

(Chicago Record-Herald.)

Go to sleep, my little one,
Cuddle down, cuddle down;
Papa's got a lullaby for you,
Shut-eye Town, Shut-eye Town.
Don't you hear the whistle blow,
"istle blow, 'istle blow!"
Now we're off, so cuddle low, cuddle low, cuddle low.

Where's that nurse, I wonder? Oh,
Cuddle low, cuddle low, 'istle low.
If she doesn't come blamed soon—um—gee
whizz! whizz! whizz! whizz! whizz!
I would give a lot to know
Where she is, 'istle low, 'istle low.
Say, confound you, if you don't stop squawling I'll fling you down on that bed, where you'll have a chance to go it till you get tired, and you can make up your mind
right here that I mean biz, bizzie biz, bizzie biz.

Now you, we're off again,
Whooop-a-hoo, whooop-a-hoo!
Hear the rattle of the train,
Down the way, lovely way,
Listen to the birds sing, 'irdies sing,
Where the little leaflets swing, leaflets
swing, leaflets swing—
Oh, I wish I had a string
On that nurse, I'll bet I'd bring Her upon the runny run, 'unny 'un, unny am.

So, that's what I'd do, by jing!
That's my little one, 'unnie one, 'unnie
one.

There, by George! Now yell till your lungs get raw if you want to,
and the next time you moan ask me to take care of you just a minute while she goes out for the afternoon threepenny tea-be a bump for I'm all done, 'unnie am, 'unnie 'un, 'unnie 'un, done, done, DONE!
